

We need industry to vote!

Our industries provide the fuels and materials that America and the world needs to thrive. But we're also facing unprecedented challenges from elected leaders and regulators who are advancing policies that threaten our industries' ability to operate. That's why it's never been more important to make our voices heard at the ballot box.

Why is our vote important?

Elected officials have an outsized impact on our industry

From tax incentives and environmental regulations, to creating fuel policies and trade agreements, elected officials at every level of government have an outsized impact on our industry. When you vote, you help decide what kinds of policies, regulations and agreements will be implemented.

But, not enough people from our industry vote

Did you know that in many local elections, less than 15% of eligible citizens turn out to vote? Often, these are the elections that matter most to our jobs and our ability to operate. When so few people elect leaders, it means that a small group of people — who very likely don't understand our industry or its impact — are setting the rules we live and work by. This can result in misguided policies that can hurt our jobs, our industries and our country.

When members of industry — like us — vote, we help prioritize issues that affect us

Most politicians are responsive to the people who help them get into and stay in office. When members of our industry show up to vote, that tells our elected officials that they should prioritize issues and policies that impact our industries.

How to vote in this year's elections

Use the QR Code to:

- Check your voter registration status
- Learn about candidates and issues on the ballot in your state
- Keep tabs on important election deadlines